Iran's air taxi launched; flight costs under $75 per hour

Hossein Pourfarzaneh, head of the Civil Aviation Organization, had previously announced the launch of air taxis by the end of 2024. Referring to the complexities of the implementation of this project, he said that the necessary implementation preparations and agreements would be made; a promise that was fulfilled with the flight of the first air taxi on the Karaj-Qazvin route.

An air taxi, also known as a "flying taxi", is a small, light aircraft designed for short, urgent trips. Due to their low weight and high maneuverability, these aircraft can also land at small, local airports, making it easy to access different areas. This project was implemented using the fleet of aircraft with a capacity of under 19 people available in the country and in cooperation with private aviation companies.
